The Porsche and BMW track-to-field racers of the 1960s were known as Le Mans racers, and they didn't have a lot in common with the vehicles that were racing at Indy. In fact, they were quite different from the cars on the track in Le Mans. On most American races, the engine was mounted at the back of the vehicle, but on the Le Mans cars the engine was placed in the middle of the car, and the front suspension was completely gone. The brake disk is much larger than what would be used on a standard road car. During the seventies, the fuel economy was improved and the Le Mans cars looked a little bit more normal. At a length of L, the fuel tank is much bigger. The car has no suspension system and is completely enclosed, so there are no shock absorbers or other devices that can absorb road shock. Because the car is completely enclosed, there is no air pressure in the tires. This means that tires are mounted directly to the rims of the car, and there is no rubber in between. In a Le Mans car, the tires are typically mounted on much larger diameter rims, which also makes them much heavier. The cars are so stiff that they actually use a different set of tires for the race than for the street. 82157476af
