John Carnap. The primary aim of this proposal is to understand the pathogenesis of neovascularization and vasculogenesis in human and experimental retinal disorders and to explore potential strategies for therapy. The proposed studies are based on the hypothesis that the survival and growth of neovascular cells in the retina is regulated by specific growth factors and that inhibiting their production or activity will block retinal neovascularization. Our research design will focus on endothelial cells (EC) in a number of retinal disorders. Our first series of experiments is designed to assess the kinetics of EC in culture (Aim 1). We will seek to determine if EC are activated and growth arrested, and if growth factors or inhibitors of growth factor receptor kinase function can interfere with such activation and growth arrest. We will characterize the expression of receptors for angiogenic peptides (Aim 2). Our second series of experiments is designed to determine the effect of trophic factors, antiproliferative agents and anti-growth factor receptor inhibitors on the kinetics of EC proliferation. Our third
